TEACHING PHILOSOPHY

My teaching philosophy embraces 'experimental learning theory' (Kolb, 1984), which focuses on how teachers acquire and transform new experiences and how these experiences lead to a greater sense of satisfaction, motivation or development. David Kolb's work can be traced back to that famous dictum of Confucius around 450 BC: "Tell me, and I will forget. Show me, and I may remember. Involve me, and I will understand." Experimental learning is especially important to me in the teaching of finance and management courses in both postgraduate and undergraduate programs, which require students to take the theory of finance and Banking and understand how to apply it in a business context embracing diverse work-place groups, management styles, and political and economic systems. While I believe that my students bring to my classes a richness of knowledge, I work closely with them to encourage sharing of their knowledge and approaches to problem solving, which transform my classes from a passive instruction mode to a highly interactive shared learning environment, including for me.
